Contract Security vs. In-House

What is the difference? With the right security contractor the difference could be significant. To begin the main difference between the two is that the security officers are employed by the contractor and not the client. Here are just two of the reasons why a company should consider outsourcing:

Increase in Competition-Out-sourcing security will allow your company to do its job while letting the contractor do theirs.

Increased Cost/Liabilities-Company personnel-related issues are constantly increasing creating more liabilities-not to mention how time consuming they can be.

Hiring a security contractor will help make your company more efficient while letting your management team deal with the day to day operations. Security/Safety Directors can then offer their valuable skills on more prominent areas of security consulting and analysis. Contractors are continuously recruiting for qualified officers to meet specific requirements and have back up staff available when needed. Staff that is employed by a contractor receives initial and refresher training making them knowledgeable in the ever changing demands of the security environment. What's the Cost? The cost of dealing with a contractor can be very similar to the budget of your company but you also need to factor in:

- Overtime/Holiday Pay
- Recruiting Costs
- Training
- Background Checks
- Uniforms
- Equipment Costs/Depreciation
- Administration Services
